- (b) What is meant by news?
- (c) What different interests are served by news papers?
- (d) What are the diverting areas enriched in news papers?
- (e) What is the most important influence exercised by them?

No one can fail to realise what an important part the newspaper plays in our life. Not only does it keep us informed about our out-side interests and fellow-men, but unconsciously it moulds our principles and shapes our ideas; the conscious motive in buying a news paper we may take it, is to furnish ourselves with news. And by news we mean not only accounts of comings and goings of ambassadors and ministers and the reports of events taking place in the country and in countries across the sea, but also recordings of the rise and fall of the stock-market, the prospective chances of our test team and the progress of our educational system. We can also divert ourselves with the numerous and interesting pictures, cartoons and puzzles, which readily provide a relish for the break fast table. Even our gardening problems meet with expert solution and our younger generation is not left un-provided for by its universal catering. But perhaps a more important influence the newspaper has is the one which, unknown to us, secretly lays siege to our opinions, overcomes them and marshals them at the orders of this or that writer. Many of us with a taste for reading find our choice superimposed, whilst the advertisement column by its attractive slogans, makes us unconscious victims of our snares.
